5th World Conference on Sustainability, Energy and Environment

Prague, Czech Republic 18 – 20 September 2025

The Developmental State Model and The Right to Development: Misconcepted State Subscription

Dr. Manaye Zegeye Meshesha (PhD,Ass.prof)

Addis Ababa Science and Technology University Department of Social Science, Ethiopia

Abstract

The purpose of this article is to show the conflict between the concept of development in the developmental state model with the content and concept that our world currently holds about development. The developmental state is a state that has economic development as a priority objective. On the other hand, the meaning and concept of development today is comprehensive encompassing economic, social, political, and cultural improvement and well-being of people and individuals based on their participation in a right-based process. I believe that the developmental state model should be resubscribed as the growth-centered economic model based on its purpose and the needs and behavior of the governments that followed the model, The article explores the evolution of the concept of development and examines the current level of understanding based on the framework of the Declaration on the Right to Development (DRTD), and argues that the concept of development in the developmental state model does not go along with the current development thinking. The methodology employed is desk review.

Keywords: Development, economic development, developmental state model, Declaration on the Right to Development, growth, centered.rights,